

Q: Is 6-months too young to visit?

Contributed by Questions Answers
Wednesday, 16 July 2008

Q: Sue asks, "We are planning a trip to the Branson area with our family, would a 6 month old be too young- any thing for that age group?"

A: I think at your child's age it is interesting for him or her just to experience the new sights and sounds at Silver Dollar City. I took my daughter at 6 months and she really enjoyed just walking around the park and seeing the shows. And, I have found the more action-packed the show is the more enjoyable it is for her. I would recommend the Saloon Show, and if you visit during Kids' Fest the new VeggieTales show. You can even meet Bob & Larry afterwards!

At 6 months there aren't a ton of age appropriate rides, but there are some things I think your child might enjoy. I would start with the Train Ride, a trip through Grandfather's Mansion and the Homestead Barnyard. Plus, there are some really neat activities set up especially for Kids' Fest that your child may enjoy as well. Check out this blog post for more details.

I definitely think there will be things your child will enjoy, but as you know, you have to be flexible when traveling with a little one. We have season passes, so if my daughter gets tired after a couple of hours it's not a big deal if we have to leave. Silver Dollar City does not charge admission for children under 3 years old, so your 6 month-old would get into the park for free. But, you might consider if you think the cost of admission for the rest of your family will be a good value depending on how long you think your child would be able to stay at the park and the activities you could participate in. I hope this information is helpful!